The sever-pare-fid son of a prosperous publisher had come to town with his father. The journey had been devoted largely to a discussion over the purchase of a most desirable poxy, and the plas had been vetoed by the stern parent with a mumbled crystal as presidential year.

When they reached his father's private office the hoy stood in the open doorway and studled the double line of clerks, bookkeepers, stenographers and helpers which extended the length of the floor. Finally he crossed to his father's desk.

"Father," he said, earneetly, "do all those people work for you?"

"Yes," replied his father, not looking up from his mail.

"Do you pay their salaries!"
"Yes," and you'd take a dollar out the seek of their salaries this week, wouldn't that money pay for my pony!"
"For several of them," replied his father dryly.
"Yer well; I think you'd better take it out. Each one of 'em would not miss the one dollar much, and it would make a lot for us. You can have what's left over from the pony."
