Fine National Forest

The George Washington National forest in the largest in Virginia. It stretches for nearly 100 miles along the summit and slopes of the Shenandoah mountains and for a shorter distance along the Massachusetts range. Its gross area is 802,700 acres. The land supports extensive stands of growing and mature timber. It has great value for water-shed protection and recreation purposes. Numerous cities and towns draw water supplies from its area and it constitutes an important part of the drainage area of the Shenandoah and Potomac rivers. Lying close to Washington and other large cities, its camping and outing facilities are well developed.

Vegetation of South Sea

The vegetation of the South Sea islands is naturally very luxuriant, and in itself is quite sufficient to support human life. The Polynesians live very comfortably on the natural vegetation, together with the wild fruits of the tropics and other plants which they raise.

Clay as Food

There are certain people on the earth who eat clay. They are found in China, New Guinea and Malaya. Often this curious food is treated in something like the same way that other nations treat grain. It is mixed with water, made into a paste, and freed from sand and stones and rubbish. Then it is shaped into little cakes and baked in an iron saucer.
