"Becky Sharp" Color Makes Screen Realism an Enchanting Thing

"Becky Sharp" will begin a four-day run at the Rialto theatre, Elgin Sunday bringing to movie fans a new all-color motion picture.

With the coming of color in motion pictures, the limited impressionism of the black and white screen becomes outmoded. No longer will it be possible, by clever shifts, to create a sense of the real.

An excellent example of this is make-up. The heavy, opaque make-up that is perfectly satisfactory in black and white, looks heavy and lifeless to the color camera.

Fabric is another example. A cheap piece of material gives itself away immediately in color photography. Patterns and designs that are unshapely combinations of color are still unfortunate on the screen if they are supposed to be the taste of discerning people.

Robert Edmund Jones, designer for "Becky Sharp" the Pioneer Pictures' full-color feature produced by Roben Mamoulian, shows motion picture audiences that is damask, and Miriam Hopkins and Frances Dee exactly as they would look at an evening daisant.
