Millions of Meters

It is estimated that millions of meters every 24 hours; most of them are very small. They travel however, at a high rate of speed, and were it not for the protection afforded by the earth's atmosphere they might prove a serious menace because of the terrific speed at which they move, according to a driver in the Washington Star, meteors are heated to incandescence by the resistance and friction of the air and all but a few of exceptionally large size are completely destroyed. Very large meteors, however, as they are called if they fall to the earth's surface, occasionally cause death.
